SHARE THE HEALTH!

9/11 was an event similar to Pearl Harbor - a bubble-bursting of our false sense of security and isolationism, the illusion that we're separate from the rest of the world's problems. The validity of this realization is much more apparent today though. The internet, cell phones, email, satellite TV and phones all strengthen our interconnectedness with an integrated world. In terms of the environment, this is very obvious: polluted air and water don't stop their movement because of nationally-defined borders. Though not as obvious, the spread of disease, healthy or unhealthy psychological and cultural attitudes is no less pervasive.

In some ways, we could say that just like we can't have a non-polluted country when the rest of the world is highly polluted, we can't have real health when the rest of the world has such huge health problems. And with more resources comes more responsibility.

The Sustainable Resources conference held in Boulder, Colorado between Sept. 27th and October 5th works to connect projects with resources. An extensive series of sessions will present innovative models for health promotion in the context of Health as Human Rights, Ecological Medicine and Complementary Medicine. They will explore solutions to environmental threats, diseases such as AIDS and malaria as well as examining macro-factors associated with health status, including political, economic and social elements such as those associated with rapid population growth, the limited availability of health services and medicines.

A long list of barefoot doctors and health care practitioners from developing countries have applied for help with travel expenses to attend this conference. They are the kinds of people who can use the information and contacts at this event to make dramatic, grass-roots improvements in their local health care facilities. If you would like to help some of these people attend, please contact Sustainable Resources, 303-998-1323, info@sustainableresources.org, <http://www.sustainableresources.org>.
